Currently I'm uploading to s3 using StreamedFileField and saving an image field to disk. The problem I have is that I want to be able to download images from the disk from within my own site. I know you can't download an image from the disk, but is it possible to use the same method of storing images on disk and saving a uri to the disk to a foreign image field of an ImageField in my database? The database is using Django 1.3.1 and I'm using S3 to store images. Thanks! A: I'm using S3 to store images and store/update urls to images. You're doing it wrong. S3 is fine for storing static images, but it's not for storing image urls. Store a file in S3, not a URL.

Instead, what you should be doing is storing the original file on your web server in a directory that can be directly served to the user (e.g., /images/). From the user's point of view, that file may be a jpg or png, or a gif or some other image. But whatever the original image is, you should never have a URL to that image. That's the whole point of storing a file on S3, and putting an image field in your database is just asking for trouble. It's interesting, because they use satellite technology to observe the planet, and they are able to reduce the noise as much as a factor of 100. That makes a difference 82157476af
